

The international workshop “Inside Border/Migration Control” gathers senior and junior researchers with a background in sociology, anthropology, international relations, and migration studies that are interested in those actors and organizations that put migration and border control in practice. While migrants’ motivations, itineraries, and incorporation occupy the stage of scientific research, those who control international movements remain too often understudied. Speakers will present researches focusing on Europe and the United States in particular. Our two panels tackle control away from, at and after the border and on immigration detention and deportation. Day-to-day making and unmaking of borders is investigated from the perspective of history, policymaking, surveillance and control, contestation, and human agency.
